2. Consider Photoshop's prices. Unlike some other advanced image editing programs, you don't pay by the megabyte, and Photoshop comes with a 30-day trial period. You can buy a license for about $2,500 and get 5 gigabytes of storage for up to $750 annually — depending on your destination, the licensing rates may go up. After the 30-day trial period, you may wish to consider continuing to pay for the full version of Photoshop. 3. Make your decision. Before you go shopping, consider downloading some of the very high-quality tutorials available on the Web. You may find that this type of preparation is the fastest way to learn the basics and master the program's most frequently used features. Photoshop is much more than a tool for picture-editing practice, so don't be overwhelmed by the seemingly vast number of features. Chapter 3 provides more practical information to help you decide which aspect of the program best fits your needs. You can use both Photoshop Elements and Photoshop for image-editing work. While the Elements version has fewer features than Photoshop, its tutorials are excellent and include the capability to add most types of effects. Also, you can create a key image for an e-mail newsletter, a picture-booth display, a Web site icon, a sign, or any number of other uses for a clean and attractive image. Creating an icon in Photoshop Elements Photoshop Elements can save images in the.PNG format. You can then use these icons in any number of ways, including as an e-mail icon, a Web site icon, a forum or message board logo, or any other icon for displaying a picture on a computer or displaying it on a bulletin board or some other article. Photoshop's tools can create a series of images that you can cut and paste together to create a finished graphic. Figure 2-1 shows the steps for creating a.PNG file using the Photoshop Elements task pane, which is in the Customize screen, or working in the Canvas screen. Figure 2-1: To create an icon in Photoshop Elements, select Image Canvas and then the Photo, Vector, or Art boards. If you want to create a vector graphic that you can easily edit and resize, choose Vector Canvas. If you want to work with one image that you can maintain in the background, choose Background. You can also choose the Art boards to insert an object, shape,

Q: Can you delete a user created by me on my iPhone via the iCloud preferences in iTunes? After a few tries and failing at creating an account with iCloud on my iPhone and syncing my contacts as suggested in the Apple help docs, I eventually found a way to do it. To create a new iCloud account, follow the steps below: Tap Settings in the navigation bar. Tap iCloud. Tap Create New Account. Tap Next. Enter the Account name, your Apple ID, and a password. Enter your Apple ID password again on the next screen. Tap Next. Select your iTunes account from the list of accounts. Tap Password. Confirm your password. Tap Done. If you want to sync your contacts, tap Contacts. Tap Add Account. Enter your Apple ID and password. Confirm the password, then tap Next. Select iCloud from the list of accounts, then tap Done. When finished, you can sync your contacts and iCloud Photo Library. When trying to delete the users on my iPhone, I found the iCloud settings page in iTunes was missing the 'Delete User' button. It did have a 'Remove Apple ID' button but that was to remove my Apple ID and then I would have to re-add it. The problem is that the only way to delete the user account in the iPhone settings is to use the SEARCH function, which is rather time consuming. While trying to delete the accounts I found the -iCloud accounts (plus a few others) had a Remove button. What do you think? Is there any way to delete the users created by me in the iOS settings? PS: I have the latest update of iTunes 10.7.1 (Mac OS X 10.7) A: No, you can't delete users created by you, as such. If you are having problems deleting accounts, I would suggest you either try the steps from the iCloud help center on creating a new account, or contact Apple Support. During his annual State of the Union speech tonight, President Obama will talk about the economy, his hope that the private sector will sustain all that the government has done to get the country back on track. "We can't borrow our way to prosperity or wealth, and we can't spend our way out of the crisis," the president said yesterday. He's right to

The present invention relates generally to the field of knowledge-based search engines. More particularly, the invention relates to generating and displaying an image of the facial area of a human user and using the image to create a context for a search. Conventional knowledge-based search engines, such as those found in Yahoo!(copyright) and Google(copyright), typically rank a document, web page or other information retrieval result according to the number of matches they find for a search query. For example, if Google(copyright) is told to provide the search result for xe2x80x9cDonald Duckxe2x80x9d, it looks through all the pages on the World Wide Web and returns the result from the one with the largest number of matches. This is called xe2x80x9cquality matchingxe2x80x9d. This quality matching is commonly used by search engines to rank documents according to relevancy based on the number of matches found. While the quality matching technique works well in some instances, it is not able to distinguish the relative quality or importance of documents when they are not equally matched. For example, a document about the theme park Disneyland(copyright) may be 10 times as relevant as a document about the traveling blue and yellow train Disneyland(copyright) as the former would probably be more popular. The other problem is that the quality matching technique does not really consider the context of the documents. For example, the document about the theme park Disneyland(copyright) may have much more information about the theme park Disneyland(copyright) than the traveling blue and yellow train Disneyland(copyright). By putting the two documents together, the quality of the context is lost. To the extent that conventional search engines consider the context of the documents, they rank the documents based on the content of the documents. For example, news articles are typically ranked higher than technical articles, news headlines are ranked higher than the news articles, and longer news articles are ranked higher than shorter news articles. This is another type of matching called xe2x80x9ccontent matchingxe2x80x9d. However, it has been found that the content of some documents, such as images, technical articles and news articles, are more important than the content of other documents, such as news headlines and very short articles. Thus, conventional search engines are unable to distinguish the relative importance of documents. Conventional search engines also do not adequately consider the fact that
